FUNSTON WASTES NO TIME.

The General at His Desk an Hour After Reaching Leavenworth.

Leavenworth, Kan., Aug. 15.—With characteristic promptness General Frederick Funston, the new commander of the army service schools, was at his desk in Sherman hall waiting an hour after his arrival at the post Friday afternoon. He sat in a big revolving leather chair that evidently had not been readjusted since occupied by his predecessor, which left the feet of the fighting Kansas "bantam" swinging easily above the surface of the floor.

"I am glad to get back to Kansas," said General Funston, as he looked out over the greenland hills of the reservation. "It is a matter of regret that I wasn't born in Kansas, but I made up for it by moving to this state when I was 3 years old, bringing my parents with me."

"That I was getting out of touch with Kansas is illustrated in my taking that old freight train over here from Lawrence. I came in on the Overland limited on the Union Pacific from San Francisco. There was nothing of my recollection of the fact that the train from Lawrence to Leavenworth was a mixed freight and passenger train."

"I haven't been in Kansas for more than a week at a time since I left here eleven years ago with the Twentieth Kansas. Mrs. Funston and children, three of them, two boys and a brand new girl, will join me here the latter part of September."

Then General Funston effectually disposed of the report that he would assume command of the post as well as the army service schools.

"The post and the school have had separate commanders ever since the school was organized, except for a short time when General Bell was in command," said General Funston. "This is not to be changed. I am to command the army service schools only, there will continue to be another commanding officer for the post."

About the first official communication read by General Funston was information to the effect that Luke E. Wright, secretary of war, and General J. Franklin Bell, chief of staff, would visit Fort Leavenworth August 21. It will be the first visit of Secretary Wright. They will be here for the formal opening of the school, September 1.
